

Dear Colleague,

Relational Psychoanalysis continues to reinvent itself, acquiring new meanings and understandings as it contends with the ongoing social and political upheaval around the world. How do our theories and our various clinical styles make room for national and international crises that profoundly alter our surroundings and fellow humans? What is the relationship between the political consequences of a national maelstrom and the analytic dyad that attempts to make sense of and process what is going on around them? How do our respective individual histories interact with large-scale historical events that are unfolding in real time as we traverse the mental landscape in the consulting room?

The themes of this, our 16th IARPP conference, emerged from our shared concerns about the massive political changes that are occurring in the United States. We are currently a nation rife with divisions; inundated with hate, competing claims on truth, paranoia, and a distrust of the Other. For some, a primary concern is the debasement of moral practices that all democratic collectivities depend on; populism in the US and around the world threatens critical thought, empathic identification, collective determination, and community building. For others, there is a chronic feeling of inequality, disempowerment, and a lack of change over time that has fueled the bitterness and animosity so pervasive in the current political climate. This conference will take up many different areas in Relational thought, but will also directly address immediate matters of concern that have a long history such as immigration, racism, and national/international trauma.

Our hope is that this conference may provide a forum to join together in examining political and social crises similar to the one currently going on in the United States and, in so doing, clarifying what we can learn from living through troubled times, both about the self and the world. We will seek to understand the repetition of trauma to explain in part how we have arrived at a certain point in history as well as more deeply grasp its nefarious and complex impact on both members of the analytic dyad. We will consider the place of truth and objective fact alongside that of postmodern constructivism, multiplicity, and the importance of holding the complexity of experience and its inherent ambiguity. As we consider the significance of Relational thinking in our often challenging contemporary experience, we will examine the persistent assault on “otherness” and difference, and think about negotiating the transference and countertransference terrain within an impinging political context.

We want to join emergent progressive forces by making our own kind of noise as we speak together and learn from one another how better to understand and help the people in our care. As clinicians and theorists confronting an “uncertain world,” we are committed to considering how these massive social forces affect and infect the working of minds in the consulting room and in our everyday lives. How, as clinicians, can we play a role in encouraging positive change in our world?

We will come together as an international community to share lessons learned from the experiences of our patients and ourselves. Apart from the plenary sessions, the program includes a number of invited panels along with many submitted papers and panels demonstrating the creativity and scholarship of the membership of our organization.

We look forward to seeing you in New York.

COVER ART: The image of Post-It notes covering the Statue of Liberty was originally derived from photographs taken by Kim Bernstein on November 18, 2016 in the Union Square subway station at 14th Street, New York City. In the days and weeks following the US presidential election, these and thousands of other messages began to cover the walls of this busy transit hub, expressing the hopes and fears of everyday New Yorkers. The project, started as an art installation called “Subway Therapy,” has been taken down and preserved by the New York Historical Society.
