Present:

A TEACH-IN EVENT On Saturday, April 16, 2005

CHAIR: SUSIE ORBACH

WHAT IS RELATIONAL PSYCHOANALYSIS?

Relational Psychoanalysis has developed in both the USA and Europe to include the intersubjective, interpersonal perspective in clinical work and theory. Many colleagues ask us 'Aren't we all relational?' However, when we begin to examine how this perspective works clinically, crucial differences appear. This 'Teach-In Event' is an opportunity to explore with us current relational thinking in clinical practice and theory. We will be discussing the history, context, development and implications of relationality; a clinical paper by Jody Davies (sent out in advance); personal routes to relational perspectives from diverse backgrounds including psychoanalytic, humanistic, integrative and Jungian.

The International Association for Relational Psychoanalysis and Psychotherapy (IARPP), founded in 2001, is a professional and intellectual community of individuals - clinicians, academics, candidates and students - committed to developing relational psychoanalytic perspectives. The IARPP has been chaired first by Stephen Mitchell, then by Lewis Aron, and currently by Stuart Pizer. The IARPP seeks inclusive dialogue with other psychoanalytic perspectives and is not oriented toward the consolidation of any particular doctrine or professional interest. Its international nature promotes the exchange of ideas and the development of intellectual and professional community among members from different cultures. The IARPP sponsors a major biennial conference as well as smaller conferences and real-time and cyber colloquia and seminars. The IARPP maintains a website, issues a newsletter, and offers its members various other benefits, such as considerable discounts on books and journals.

After a hugely successful inaugural conference in New York in 2001, IARPP held conferences in Toronto, Ontario and in Santa Monica, California. The Rome conference will be IARPP's first European conference and will feature renowned speakers and presenters from many countries. The IARPP Rome conference chairs have chosen the Stenditoio, conveniently located in the historic Trastevere district of Rome. Trastevere is a beautiful section of Rome with plenty of hotels, bed & breakfasts, restaurants, bars, cafes. The Stenditoio, a beautiful, 17th century building, is today owned and run by the State Department for Fine Arts and Architecture.
