The Relational Pulse: Controversies, Caricatures, and Clinical Wisdom

THURSDAY, JUNE 25 – SUNDAY, JUNE 28, 2015

CONFERENCE CO-CHAIRS

Dear Colleague,

An international conference such as IARPP's "The Relational Pulse" is an opportunity. The 2015 annual IARPP Conference will provide different angles and shifts of light on the contemporary relational sensibility, and on the different motivations we have for doing our work. The compiled parts of this conference are our collective inventory and desire. "The Relational Pulse" is about the past, present, and future in the clinical and scholarly domains, not about fashionable trends.

Since Stephen Mitchell first coined the term relational psychoanalysis, this phrase has encompassed a range of rich understandings and clinical approaches that share significant features while they may also diverge quite radically. Major differences mark the interpersonal, self psychological, object relational, and existential versions of relationality. While all richly contributing to the overarching perspective, each favors a particular theoretical emphasis and corresponding clinical sensibility.

Mitchell's carefully considered comparative methodology illuminated how each expression of a relational vision unequivocally locates the development of human experience within a context of relationships with others, internal, external and in fantasy; each is at the same time rooted in somewhat differing assumptions about mind, human growth, and the central dynamics of treatment. Each has its distinctive narrative and recognizable clinical expression.

Proponents of these versions of a relational approach are at times inclined to claim the entire perspective, equating their particular vision with the relational perspective as a whole. And critics—both from within the relational world and outside it—have at times offered superficially caricatured critiques, selecting some clearly partial version of the perspective and treating it as though it could stand in for the actual complexity of the whole, with its multiple contending parts and clinical practices.

So, well beyond the superficial notion of an inclusive, tolerant "broad tent," this conference will explore an alternative view: that the greatest strength of the relational perspective emerges when the multiple emphases within it are held in a creative tension—a dialectical tension in which each complements, as well as clashes, with the others.

While quite challenging to the clinician—inevitably demanding the analyst's radical openness both to themselves and to their patients—this vision of relational multiplicity is, we believe, less likely to become narrowly enshrined as the correct relational—or analytic—path. It is, we believe, how we can use our differences—as Mitchell used the comparative psychoanalytic method—to grow, change, and expand the meanings of what is relational from within.

Viewing clinical material in each of our plenaries, we'll explore how these various emphases within the relational paradigm actually differ from one another and express themselves within the treatment relationship. What does it mean that we emphasize opening up to oneself? How does one live in the dialectical tensions, the heightened paradoxes, that clashing perspectives will invariably evoke? How can we attempt to live creatively and effectively in the conflicts and inherent multiplicity of the relational analytic world?

We urge you to take advantage of the rich opportunities offered by IARPP at our 2015 annual conference, "The Relational Pulse", to learn from the presenters, to engage in the discussions, to start new friendships, and to consolidate old friendships. In other words, the heart of this conference is dialogue. May it offer you memorable memories.

— Hazel Ipp, Margaret Black, Jody Davies and Spyros Orfanos, IARPP 2015 Conference Co-Chairs
